(Doctoral Course October Admission)

Admission Guide
2017 Academic Year

The important notice about the program funding is attached to the end of this admission guide. All the applicants should read the notice carefully.

Nagoya University Graduate School of Law (referred to as “GSL” or “Graduate School” below) invites students to apply to the graduate program in “Cross-Border Legal Institution Design.” This is a new five-year graduate program introduced under the Program for Leading Graduate Schools, an initiative of the Japanese government. The program offers a Master’s degree in Comparative Law, and a Doctorate in Comparative Law.

The Program invites students to apply to the Doctoral course not only from the program of “Cross-Border Legal Institution Design” but also from other graduate programs in law or political science.

The program in "Cross-Border Institutional Design" is one of the LL.M. (Comparative Law) and LL.D. (Comparative Law) tracks in Law and Political Science. The program is supported by a seven-year funding commitment by the Japanese Ministry of Education (MEXT), under the Leading Graduate Schools initiative. This external funding commitment will come to an end on March 31, 2018. Academic work to fulfill degree requirements will not be affected by the transition, but certain features of the "Cross-Border Institutional Design" program may be discontinued at that point in time (specifically, the research stipend, and financial support for overseas research activities).

Program Outline

This program is aimed at candidates intending to pursue careers in an international setting, with a focus on the design, adaptation, and implementation of legal institutions novel to target environments.

The program encourages group research where members from different jurisdictions work together. A good command of at least one Asian language is required for candidates proceeding to the Doctorate course.

Given the emphasis on the group research and the transplantation of legal institutions, those who will enroll in this program from the Doctoral course must take some courses* offered in the Master’s course.

- Introduction to Joint Research on Comparative Study of Law, Comparative Politics Workshop, Legal Transplantation and Joint Research Workshop I & II.

Graduates will learn professional skills to propose fresh ideas of legal transplantation through critical analysis of social problems, to draft laws for social reforms, to work out understanding and cooperation among stake-holders, and to take leadership in implementation of transplantation plans.

Important Notice: Integration of “the Leading Program” into “the Postgraduate Program in Law and Political Science”

Background

The Program for Leading Graduate Schools was introduced nationwide in 2011 with special funding by the Japanese Ministry of Education. The special funding covers a period of seven years. Nagoya University Graduate School of Law introduced the "Cross-Border Legal Institution Design" program in 2011 as part of its Postgraduate Program in Law and Political Science. Special funding for the "Cross-Border Legal Institution Design" program will end in March 2018, and the program will be integrated into the Postgraduate Program in Law and Political Science from April 1, 2018. There will be some important changes with this integration. This notice will explain what changes will take place from April 2018.

Expected Changes

1. Research Stipend

Currently, a majority of graduate students accepted by the program are offered a monthly research stipend of JPY 200,000 . From April 2018, this stipend will be discontinued and each student will be responsible for the costs associated with their program. Though the program is seeking alternative sources of funding to cover the various costs of learning, the program has not yet obtained any alternative funding. All applicants and students must be aware of this change.

2. Summer Internship Grant

The program offers substantial grants that allow students to pursue overseas internships and field research during their summer break. The summer internship grant will be discontinued from the summer of 2018. The alternative funding situation is the same as that of the research stipend.

3. Asian Language Training

The program asks students to achieve a practical command of one Asian language during the five year period. The program currently provides special tutorial learning for students during their first two years. Except for the language programs provided by Nagoya University, special tutorial arrangements will not be provided from April 2018.

4. Educational Program (curriculum)

- (1) The program requires students to take courses that operate under special funding, namely Seminars in International Law and Politics (the course name for the summer internship and field research). Since the special funding for these courses will no longer be available from April 2018, these courses will be offered as optional rather than compulsory. The costs related to summer internship are the responsibility of the students.
- (2) The program requires students to take a substantial number of courses during the first two years of study (the program for a Master's degree). All required courses will become optional from April 2018.
- (3) Nagoya University Graduate School of Law will, however, continue to offer the "Cross-Border Legal Institution Design" program. Students who complete the program will receive a degree certificate with special mention certifying the student's completion of the program in "Cross-Border Legal Institution Design."
- (4) From April 2018, the "Cross-Border Legal Institution Design" program will accept graduate students from the Postgraduate Program in Law and Political Science. Those who are accepted will be asked to take some specified courses in order to receive a degree certificate with the special mention. The program may provide students with funds for overseas summer internships and field research.

The course requirements and related funding will be explained in a separate brochure.
